CLUSTER ONE

CHURCH & STATE IN EARLY NSW

The colony of New South Wales was founded at a time when the Church of England was the established, that is, official religion of England if not the British Isles. The Monarch was, and still is, the titular head of this Church. This establishment meant in effect that the Anglican Church was the only church supported by the state. Other Protestant churches had long been tolerated since the seventeenth century while the status of the Catholic Church remained precarious. It would have been expected therefore that such an official recognition would continue in the British colony. Yet it quickly became evident that such a situation was not to be repeated in the colony and that the various churches, along with synagogues, were to enjoy a near equal status in NSW. This arrangement would be solidified and repeated in the other Australasian colonies, and become embedded as the secular state in both the Australian and New Zealand polities. The Mitchell library collection holds various official despatches, pamphlets, letters, etc, which show very clearly how this situation came to be. We see how this came about through simple practical constraints, much of it to do with providing services, particularly education. It was not as a product of anti-religious idealism, but on the contrary a product of the desire for a religious freedom, led most vocally by dissenting Protestants and by an administration keen to keep a lid on conflict. This is one of the most valuable areas relating to religion and church in the collection.

CLUSTER TWO

RELIGION & SCIENCE IN THE NINETEENTH CENTURY

Although the idea that the nineteenth century represented a rupture between science and religion greatly exaggerates and simplifies a complex relationship, it is nevertheless the fact that nineteenth-century science, although often carried out (at least early in the century) by clergymen, began a challenge to the hegemony of Christian belief, or at least —to be more accurate— the authority of Scripture that climaxed in the twentieth century. The Mitchell contains many pamphlets and books, along with other material, from the period that brings the debates into to focus. We can see the influence of Darwin and evolution and how contemporaneous was the discussion in Australasia with that in UK (undermining the belief that there was a great delay in the dissemination of ideas). The purpose of confining this to the nineteenth century is that it represents the most problematic phase, before a clear line was set between the two.

Included in the cluster is that material which is can be seen as engendered by the scientific challenge, such as works justifying or challenging religion, such as that from the period listed under such headings as RELIGION & SOCIETY.

The cluster also includes material on or by missionary-anthropologists such as R.H. Codrington and George Brown, as well as look at the variety of responses to question of race by religious groups.

CLUSTER THREE

MISSIONS & MISSIONARIES

This is a major field in which the Mitchell collection excels. It includes various records of mission societies and mss and journals and pictorial collections from many individual missionaries. It is a large and rich collection particularly pertaining to Pacific Christianity and Missions to Australian Aborigines.

The extent of the material on the Pacific and Melanesia is testament to the importance of Sydney as the shipping out port for missionaries to the Pacific islands and Melanesia. Yet in a very real sense this represented a mission to other places, a going out to bring the Word to distant lands.

The mission to Aboriginal Australia had a different and much more critical aim. It was about saving the remnants and/or managing the problem of the survivors as seen by migrant/settler Australia.

For most of the nineteenth-century the differing contexts produced starkly contrasting outcomes. Missionary success in the Pacific, abject failure in Australia.

And yet as different as they the material crosses over. For instance in the missionary societies that operate in both Australia and the Pacific. There are areas which present themselves as very strong. The material on Samuel Marsden is of course very strong, but so to is the material on Lancelot Threlkeld, one of the most important and intriguing early missionaries. The issue here would be to look at how the first European to seriously apply himself to understanding and working in an Australian language. Both Marsden and Threlkeld relate to the very important London Missionary Society material in the collections. There are also very strong Methodist collections. And a great deal of material relating to Papua New Guinea Mission papers, Church Missionary Society, etc., testify to these strengths as well.

CLUSTER FOUR

TRADITIONAL RELIGIONS

Throughout the nineteenth century much was produced, much of it by amateurs on the beliefs and practices of “primitive” peoples of Oceania and elsewhere. Some of these were books but many more were pamphlets and chapbooks. The Mitchell holds a rich collections of such works. Some of them do indeed provide valuable insights and information about actual beliefs and practices. Others are more fanciful, but even these are sources to understanding how the European imagination saw the world of the Pacific. This material is classified under various headings: Mythology, Animism, primitive religions, magic & sorcery, etc.

JUDAISM IN AUSTRALIA

Through the Percy J. Marks collection the Mitchell Library has a very important collection concerned with Judaism in Australia. But as well as that collection it contains many books and pamphlets from the nineteenth century which deal, one way or another, with the place of Judaism in Australia. This includes material relation to Christian attitudes to Jews and Judaism, including missions to the Jews.

Theology and Religious Philosophy in Australia

Scriptural exegesis for the Protestant and stories of Saints for Catholics, along with more general philosophical contemplation of religious and social issues often formed the core of understandings of what beliefs were. The Library holds a very valuable collection of such works. Religious stories and poetry — which in the 19th century in particular — were intrinsic part of the religious discourse are included here.
